

The Princess Farmer

Kuzhali Manickavel

Emanuele Scanziani

 The Asia Foundation

While the author, illustrator, and publisher of this book encourage and support translation of this work into other languages, they request that substantive changes to the text and art be kept to a minimum.

Kansari was the daughter of a powerful king. Growing up, she had always wanted to be a farmer, even though she was a princess.

This made her father angry, and when she grew up, her father ordered her to leave the palace. 'I want you to experience how difficult life is outside this palace,' he said angrily. ' Only then will you come to your senses.'

So Kansari packed the seeds that she had collected throughout her childhood, and went to live in the woods.

She built a little hut and began planting seeds in the nearby field.

It was hard work, but Kansari had help from her three new friends: a cat, a parrot, and a spider.

The cat hunted rats in the field. The spider took care of the hut. The parrot flew around the kingdom and brought back the latest news. They all became good friends and lived together happily.

It wasn't long before everyone in the kingdom was talking about Kansari's lush farm. This made the king furious, and he went to Indra, the king of the gods.

The king asked Indra to help him, as he wanted to teach his daughter a lesson. 'Leave it to me,' said Indra. 'I'll send down a drought. All the crops will dry up and die.' The parrot heard this and quickly recounted it to Kansari.

Kansari and her friends then moved their crops to a damp riverbed. When the drought took place, all the crops in the kingdom dried up, but Kansari's crops survived.

Indra saw this and scratched his head. 'I'll send down a flood. That should stop Kansari,' he said. But again, the parrot overheard Indra.

This time, Kansari, along with her friends, planted their crops on the slope of a hill. When the flood came, it drowned all the crops in the kingdom. Kansari's crops were the only ones that survived, because the excess water simply flowed downhill.

'I'll send hundreds of rats!' Indra decided. But the parrot told the cat of Indra's plan. 'Wonderful!' purred the cat. 'I'll call my cat friends for a feast!' Soon the cats had eaten every single rat in the field.

By now, Indra was at his wits' end. 'I'll send birds! She can't save her crops from birds!' he said.

But the spider called her spider friends, and they wove sticky webs above the crops. When the birds attacked the crops, they became stuck in the sticky web. The crops were saved once again.

By now, the king had bigger problems. The drought and flood had destroyed all the crops in the kingdom. to Indra for help. 'You don't need my help,' said Indra. 'Your daughter Kansari is already feeding your people!' People were starving. The king went

He took the king to the woods. There he saw Kansari and her friends giving away sacks of grain to everyone.

The king felt ashamed of himself and proud of his daughter. things than just living in a palace. Don't you agree?' Indra said: 'There are nobler palace. Don't you agree?'

The king begged his daughter for forgiveness and asked her to come back to the palace.

She forgave her father but did not return to the palace; she stayed in her hut beside her fields, living happily with her friends.

Kansari later became known as the Princess Farmer.

Brought to you by

The Asia Foundation

Let's Read is an initiative of The Asia Foundation's Books for Asia program that fosters young readers in Asia. booksforasia.org
To read more books like this and get further information about this book, visit letsreadasia.org

Original Story

The Princess Farmer, author: Kuzhali Manickavel. illustrator: Emanuele Scanziani. Released under CC BY-NC-SA 4.0.

This work is a modified version of the original story. © The Asia Foundation, 2017. Some rights reserved. Released under CC BY-NC-SA 4.0.

For full terms of use and attribution,
<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-sa/4.0/>